Global movements pushing for change

UNIVERSALITY

Navigating "rigged economic systems" (part 3)

The last 2 publications highlighted the underlying causes of joblessness and its conjoined twin, poverty as a deeply concerning global phenomenon. We noted the mental models or paradigms causing the gap between Rich-Poor and how pervasive this mechanistic thinking remain across global Institutions, Corporate leaders and State advisors. We discussed how global citizens have grown weary of the empty promises from these agents and agencies. This is also the underlying reason for the many and growing global movements that have decided to make a difference in the absence of State & Corporate support in transforming the global economy to an egalitarian and transparent model.

We acknowledged we are currently "transitioning" into a new era of being people-centric as opposed to the classic self-centricity (selfish, inward approach of hoarding). We noted that the transition period must contain the re-establishment of trust of all global citizens, which in itself will be a long journey since State & Corporate profligacy is difficult to surrender irrespective of one's philanthropic tendencies. In other words the traditional State & Corporate wastefulness, recklessness and decadence will not be capitulated without our continued assault on their sensibilities. Here we refer to the many movements in all countries pushing aggressively for real change, which in turn have resulted in the many collaborations and innovations arising from these groups. At the risk of repeating ourselves, we noted the need for seeking out "labour-of-love" which is to say that we should as far as possible pursue work in areas we are passionate about. The underlying reason is that such passion keeps us open to learning & adaptation, whilst allowing us the energy and focus to overcome any barriers and obstacles on this journey.
